

Adam Gonnelli

Principal

Law Office of Adam R. Gonnelli

Adam Gonnelli has litigated on behalf of consumers and investors for more than twenty years and represents clients who have been victims of digital asset theft. His recent major cases include securing a settlement valued at $760 million in a case concerning defective auto engines; recovering more than $50 million from a major defense contractor for selling defective holographic rifle sights; and a reaching a multimillion-dollar recovery for U.S. patent holders related to international patent renewal services.

Adam also serves as an Adjunct Professor at Seton Hall Law School and teaches a course on the Law of Cryptocurrency, Digital Assets and the Metaverse. He is also General Counsel to an NFT company.

While attending Cornell Law School, Adam served as Editor-in-Chief of the Cornell Journal of Law and Public Policy and was a member of the Atlantic Regional Championship moot court team. At Rutgers University - Newark, Adam served as Student Government President and lettered in football and fencing.

Before attending law school, Adam was a Financial Writer at the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, where he wrote educational materials on international trade and monetary policy. Adam has also served as a youth sabre instructor at the American Institute of Fencing and has worked with Paws of War, which helps veterans obtain service dogs. Adam also enjoys pretending he's part of the coding industry because he once wrote a space combat program using Python.